The North-west Passage, 1940-1942 And 1944: The Famous Voyages Of The Royal Canadian Mounted Police Schooner "St. Roch"

Synopsis

In 1928 the RCMP commissioned the St. Roch for Arctic service. During its first voyage into the Arctic, Larsen served as mate under a captain that the RCMP hired, but, once in the Arctic, Larsen was appointed captain. Larsen commanded the St. Roch for most of the next two decades, rising to the rank of Sergeant. In the final years of Larsen's career, he was the senior RCMP officer in the Arctic. Following his command of the St. Roch, Larsen was promoted to Inspector with responsibility for all Arctic detachments. For the first twelve years that the ship was in commission, Larsen and his crew took supplies to scattered RCMP posts in Canada's far north. The St. Roch was specially constructed to be able to survive being frozen-in all winter. During the winter, the RCMP officers who formed her crew would use dog sleds to turn the St. Roch into a floating RCMP outpost. During this time, the St. Roch was the only Canadian presence in the far north, carrying out various governmental duties. This is his story. --This text refers to an out of print or unavailable edition of this title.
